He boarded in Mrs. Dorsett's flat. Yesterday a friend met him on the street, and Sullivan told him that he was tired of life, and that he was sick, and his head troubled him a great deal. This friend says Sullivan looked wild and acted queerly, and he was afraid he meant to do himself harm.

He also says that Sullivan was a cigurette flend, and smoked all the time. When they parted yesterday, Sullivan bought several packages of cigarettes and went back to his room.

This morning he got up and dressed himself, and took his breakfast early with the other boarders in the flat. Shortly after 8 o'clock one of the servants went into the front room and found Sullivan on the floor bleeding profusely from a terrible gash acrops the throat. It had been done with a rasor, which lay on the floor by his side.

The police were summoned and an alarm sent out for an ambulance. Sullivan was nearly unconscious, and was not able to talk when the surgeon arrived.

Sullivan had several relatives in the city, and his aunt, Miss Sullivan, lives at 1182 First avenue.
